Chapter B: Date Night, Noah's Style
Author Note: This chapter is written from Noah's perspective.

"Where are we going?" Cameron asked me, blindfolded. I haven't told him anything about what I had planned for tonight – I knew that if I told him, he would absolutely hate it and wouldn't be open to trying it at all. There was still that risk, but it was one I was willing to take. If I could just get him to the athletics complex without him noticing, there was at least a small chance he'd go along with it. Even if he still didn't want to, I had a backup plan that would work to get him to change his mind.
"You'll see soon enough, we're almost there," I answered him softly. I gave him a small kiss on his hand as I led him to one of the hockey rinks in the winter sports area. I opened the door and led him inside.
"Why is it so cold in here?" he asked. His body shook at the brisk change in temperature, and his breathing became sharper as he breathed in the cold air.
"Let me just get that blindfold off of you, and you'll see for yourself," I said as I reached around his head to untie it.
"It's about time! You know I don't like…" he started, before looking around and recognizing the arena as the same one he saw me play in. But this time, completely empty. "… surprises," he finished, annoyed that I would even think of bringing him here for a date. "A hockey date? Really?" he said, looking at me angrily and crossing his arms.
"Not hockey – just some skating," I responded.
"Then why is there a bunch of hockey gear here? There are pucks and sticks everywhere, and the nets are set up."
"If we use it, we use it – if not, we don't. I know you're not athletic – I just want to make you feel the same way you made me feel on the date you planned. I want you to get a bit out of your comfort zone – to step into my world a little bit. If you're not into trying hockey, that's fine. I just want to have a nice time skating with you."

"There's… just one problem with your plan…" he said, slowly and hesitantly.
"And what would that be?" I asked him.
"I… I don't know how to skate," he answered quietly, looking down at the floor as if he was embarrassed to admit it.
"That's okay, I'll teach you. If us dumb jocks can do it, you can too," I reassured him.
"I don't know, Noah…" he said, still hesitant. He turned towards the door and started to walk towards it, almost like he was bailing on me. I instantly thought I blew it. Of course he wouldn't be into the athletic date. Damn it Noah, why'd you think he'd even try it? I thought. I guess it was time to break out my backup plan, the plan I was hoping I'd have to use the entire time.
"I thought you might say that. How about this – you try skating with me for a while, and later tonight, I'll let you play with…" I started, as I lifted my pants leg to reveal that under my warm gear, I was wearing the blue and white striped thigh-high socks I'd bought for him to enjoy as part of his fantasy. "… your own little jock femboy, just like you wanted."

"Incentivising me with sex… interesting approach…" he started before pausing. His eyes started darting back and forth, one hand under his chin, the other pointing in the air. I'd recognize those actions and that stance anywhere – he was thinking. It looked like he was making a pro-and-con list that only he could see. He always does that when he's making a big decision. Or any decision, really. It's one of those nerdy things he does, and I love watching him do it. He's so cute when he's thinking. "If it'll get me some femboy action, I guess I can try it for a while," he finally said, a little bit interested. I wasn't sure if he was interested in the skating or just the sex, but I didn't care. I took what I could get, and I got what I hoped for.
"Hey, don't blame me for knowing my audience. If I have to bribe you with some fantasy time to get you to try it… let's just say, I'm not above it – you may even say I'm into it," I said, shooting him a wink. "Who knows, maybe you'll even like it – the skating, not the sex – I know you love the sex already. You can tell me about all the science that makes skating possible too – I'd love to hear it – so it's not just me teaching you tonight. Teach me the science of skating. Teach me about friction or forces, or whatever it is that keeps us from being put on YouTube as part of a 'skating fails' compilation, or on that show with the giant red balls."

"You know what, I like that idea. How do we get started?" he asked me.
"Step one of skating: put on the skates. You can't do anything without them. Here, I got you a pair from our spares. Put your foot in just like you would with normal shoes, and I'll help you tie them up," I told him. He reached his foot out to me, and I slid one skate over it, holding it like it was our Cinderella moment. Starting at the bottom, I pulled the laces tight. Not too tight that it cramped his foot, but snug enough so it wouldn't move. "They need to be a bit tighter than shoes so your foot doesn't move – that can end very badly," I said, "and I don't want that."
"That makes sense – I wouldn't want that either," he said.
"How's that feel? Is it too tight?" I asked him as I tied the knot.
"It's… different – it's definitely tighter than how I wear my shoes, but I can still feel my foot, so I don't think it's too tight."
"Great, that's what I was going for. It'll feel weird for a bit, but you'll get used to it after a while. Now, the other one." I helped him get the other skate on before I put mine on. "There, we're both officially ready to skate," I said.

"But don't we have to get to the ice first?" he asked.
"Yeah, that's what I was just getting at – It might be hard for you to get over there, so we'll take it slowly. Use me for support if you need it."
"Alright," he said as he got up off the bench, taking my hand before wobbling around a bit.
"Woah, that's different… I feel like I'm learning to walk all over again," he joked with me.

“Technically, you are. You’re used to your body weight being distributed along the entire width of your foot – now it’s distributed on something much smaller. It’ll take some getting used to. Just hold on to me, and we’ll get to the ice together.”
“Are you sure you need me to teach you the science of skating? You just explained the physics of that perfectly,” he asked me.
“That’s about as much science as I know,” I answered him, smiling and laughing slightly, “so yeah, I still need you to teach me.”

We walked slowly over to the ice – it felt natural to me, but I could tell Cam was still getting used to it. He was wobbly, only taking small, calculated steps, his arms out to try and keep his balance. It seemed to work for him; he only needed my support for the first few steps before getting used to it. Then, I only needed to help occasionally when he lost balance. As we reached the edge of the ice, I stopped him before we entered. “Hold on a second – we’ve got to take off our blade guards, and I’ve got to tell you how to safely get on.”
“Taking the guards off – is that something I could do?” he asked, suddenly interested.
“Absolutely. Watch me, then you try it. Just hold on to the board here,” I said as I grabbed the board next to the open door, “Lift your foot up, and grab this part,” I continued, pointing to the fluorescent orange plastic of the blade guard, “and pull it off like this.” I slowly slid the guard off the blade. “Then, do the same for the other one. Just be careful not to nick yourself with the blade. We can leave them here on the board. Since we’re the only ones here, nobody will touch them.”
“Sounds easy enough, so like this?” he asked, carefully mimicking my actions and taking both guards off without incident.
“Just like that. Perfect, like you usually are.” I told him, partially joking, partially romantic, and fully honest. I saw his face light up as his smile grew and a soft shade of pink came onto his face. It almost looked like he didn’t expect to get it right, or to be praised for it. I know I loved it when he praised me, so I hoped the same might work for him. Judging by his reaction, it did, and I loved it.

“Now for the important part: getting on to the ice,” I started. I saw his eyes widen in fear as the panic set in on his face.
“Is it… Is it really that scary?” he said, somewhat shakily.
“It can be – but that’s why I’m here. I’ll help you get through it. Hold on to me and use the railing if you need it. We’ll do it together.” His arm came across my back as I positioned the both of us at the edge of the gate. I put my hands at his hips to steady him. “Okay, what we’re doing right now is just getting you on the ice. Don’t worry about going anywhere. It’s just another step. Don’t worry, I’ve got you.”
“Okay…” he said, worried, as he took the step that got him on the ice. “Woah!” he yelled as he slipped a bit, arms flailing in the air. I instantly caught him and stabilized him.

“Told you I’ve got you! There, you did it – you’re on the ice. Now just hold on to the railing for a few seconds so I can get on,” I said as I entered the ice with the usual precision of a seasoned hockey player. “So… how’s it feel?” I asked him as I skated some small circles around him, allowing him some time to adjust to the sensation of the ice underneath his feet.
“It feels… I don’t know how to describe it,” he said, holding tightly on the railing, beginning to find some balance.
“That’s sounds about right – I felt the same way the first time I got on the ice. That’s okay, give it some time,” I reassured him. “Now, what do you say we start moving?” I asked.
“Moving… I’m not sure I’m ready yet.”
“Sure you are! I’ll be right beside you!”
“Alright then, I guess. How do we do it?”
“It’s sort of the same as taking that first step, except instead of stepping, it’s more of a push. Watch how I do it,” I said. I bent my knees slightly, took a step forward and pushed off. I glided across the ice for a few seconds before turning and stopping right next to him. “Just like that. Ready?”
He hesitated for a few seconds, before saying “I guess, here goes nothing…” He copied my movements exactly, bending his knees, lifting one foot off the ice, and slightly pushing off. He started wobbling around, arms flailing again, so I supported him. He moved only an inch or so, but it was a start.
“Great job, you did it! How about another small glide? Just remember to keep your knees bent and your weight centered.”
“Okay…” he said before repeating the motions. He pushed off a bit stronger this time, so he slid a few inches before stopping. “Hey… I’m moving!” he said, his voice having some mix of pride and surprise that he was able to do it.
“You sure are!” I started, laughing slightly. Not at him, but at his reaction to something that’s became second nature to me. “Keep going: tiny pushes, slow, gentle glides. That’s it, you’ve got this” I encouraged him.

We kept skating for a bit – I taught him how to turn by leaning in a bit without overthinking it, and how to shift his weight to stop before he ran into the board. I even explained that if he leaned in to the stop a bit, he could add a bit of a flourish to it. He seemed to like that part best – I mean, everyone does: seeing a cloud of snow as someone comes to a stop on the ice would make anyone laugh. At first, he was making calculated movements. Every glide, every turn he made, he gained a bit of confidence. His arms were still out, but less flailing around as he picked up how to balance himself. I was right beside him the whole time to steady him when he needed it, but he didn’t need it that much. “See, you’re doing it without even thinking! It’s not so scary when you have someone to teach you, isn’t it?” I joked with him.
“I guess not… it’s actually kind of fun, especially with you here,” he said.
“I told you… How about you try letting go of the board?”
“I’m not sure… what if I lose balance?”

“Don’t worry, I’ll be right beside you. I’ll catch you.”
“Alright, here it goes…” His arm slowly let go of the board, and he wobbled slightly. My body tensed up, ready to catch him, but I didn’t have to – he managed to balance himself.
“Wow, look at you go! I didn’t even have to catch you! You’re doing great!”
We kept skating around the ice for a while, and I started skating in front of him instead of right beside him. He kept his balance, and as we glided, a smile slowly spread across his face. He seemed to actually enjoy it – I hadn’t expected that – but as he would say, my hypothesis had been disproven. “Let’s try something…” I said. “Stop here. I’m going to go to center ice, and I want you to glide into my arms. You think you can do that?”
“I think I can… I’m not using the board anymore, and you don’t need to be supporting me. Let’s try it,” he answered, his newfound enthusiasm showing through his voice.
“Great – that’s the spirit! I’ll go over, and when I stop moving, you glide over to me.” I started gliding quickly to the all-too-familiar red circle in the middle of the ice, before stopping at the blue face-off spot directly in the middle. As soon as I stopped, Cam started moving towards me, almost with almost as much confidence and precision as I had, but much slower. As I saw him inch closer, I could only feel proud of him. He reached me, stopping like we discussed, sending a small cloud of snow in the air around us.

“I did it! I did it!” he screamed.
“You did! Great job! And if I do say so myself, nice flourish on the stop.”
He laughed slightly, his face flushed. “You saw that, did you?” he said.
“I did,” I answered, before pulling him close. Suddenly, I saw our team’s promotional blimp emerge from the other side of the ice, and I faintly saw one of the other people on the team piloting it. Oh no… I thought. “Um… just wait here for a second, I’ll be right back,” I nervously told Cam.
“What’s going on?” he asked.
“Nothing… Just… wait,” I said slowly and anxiously, before quickly skating over to the gate.

“Miller – what are you doing here? I booked this rink for a date!” I quietly screamed.
“I’m checking the drone for tomorrow’s game, like I usually do. Sorry, I didn’t know,” Miller answered. “Who’s your date?”
“Um, I can’t really say… I mean I want to, but I can’t. Not without his permission.”
“Ooh, his?”
“Yeah, you know I’m bi, so why are you surprised?”
“I don’t know, it’s just weird seeing you on a date with another guy.”
“Well, it’s not weird – it’s 2025 dude, people can date whoever they want.”
“I know that, I’m not an idiot…”
“I know you’re not an idiot, I’m just saying…” I started before thinking of something. “Random, slightly related question, does the drone still have that camera attachment on it?” I asked.
“Yeah, why?”

“Can you do me a solid and just fly it around and get some pictures of us?”
“I don’t see why not, sure.”
“Thanks dude – I wanted to get pictures of us on the ice, but I didn’t know how. Start flying around centre ice then try and follow us for a while. You’ll know when to start taking pictures.”
“How will I know?”
“Trust me – you’ll know.”
“Um… Okay, I guess.”

I skated back to Cam, and said “Nothing major, someone’s just testing the team’s blimp. No biggie.”
“I thought you said we were alone!” he panicked.
“We were supposed to be alone, but he didn’t know – he does have to test it, there’s some policy that says so. He’s the only advanced operations drone pilot on the team.” I started saying, trying to calm him, but I don’t think it worked. I saw the blimp come close enough to us to capture what I wanted to do, and I knew that that would calm him – at least for now. “Now… where were we?” I said romantically as I pulled Cam in close to me again, his skates gliding on the ice, before I kissed him as passionately as I could, sharing the moment I’ve wanted to share with him ever since we started skating. At the same time, I hoped that Miller caught my signal – this was the moment I wanted a picture of.
“Well…” he said, slightly breathless, “that was… unexpected.”
“But it fits the moment, doesn’t it?”
“True.”
“And I’ve never done that before.”
“Really? All your escapades and you’ve never kissed someone on the ice?”
“Never. You’re the only person I’ve taken on the ice as a date.”
“Wow… I’m glad I was your first.”
“Me too, Cam, me too.”

We stood there at centre ice kissing and holding each other for a few minutes, the blimp floating around us. Both of us were taking in the moment with each other in the silent bliss that it was – us, mostly alone at centre ice, kissing – before we went back to skating around the ice. This time, my job was done – Cam now knew the basics of skating, so now it was his turn. Cam taught me about all the physics behind how skating works. As it turns out, the skates don’t simply distribute the pressure on the ice. Apparently, we were actually gliding on a micro-thin film of water created by the friction between the blade and the ice. It turns out we both learned something new today: I taught him how to skate, and he taught me why I could.
“Is it just me, or is the blimp following us?” he asked me.
“It’s not you – I asked him to follow us. See, it’s got a camera—” I started, before he interrupted me.
“A camera? We’re not supposed to be showing anyone that we’re dating, remember?”

“Oh relax, the pictures are just for us, and I’ll get the card as soon as he lands. Nobody will ever see them without our permission.”
“That’s… sort of cute…”
“So, you’re not mad?”
“Of course not, how could I be mad at you for being cute and romantic?”
“Good – for a second there I thought I blew it again…”
“Oh, trust me, that part of the night hasn’t come yet…”
“Now who’s being romantic?” I asked, feeling hot and excited at the same time.
“Nerds can be romantic too… in so many different ways…” he said, winking at me as we went back to skating for a while.

Eventually, it was time for us to go back home so I could deliver on my promise – the part of the night I was most looking forward to, and Cam knew that.
“Okay, how do I do this?” he asked.
“It’s the same as it was when we came on – just in reverse. Carefully step out and put the guards on. Do you need my help?”
“If you could… I’m still not the best walking in these.”
“Of course. Take my hand, and we’ll do it together.” I felt his hand hold on to mine tightly as we both stepped off the ice together. I showed him how to put the guards on, and we walked to the benches to start untying our skates.
“So, what did you think?” I asked.
“You know what, I can see why you like it. It felt freeing to me – I didn’t have to think about much.”
“That’s a keen observation – does that mean you would be open to doing it again?”
“Absolutely – as much as we can.”
“That’s nice to hear. I wasn’t sure how you’d like it, and when you started to go towards the door, I thought I blew it. Thanks for holding out though.”
“No – thank you for teaching me. But… do you think we could get me my own skates?”
“You liked it that much, huh?”
“Yeah…”
“We’ll stop at the pro shop on our way out, then we’ll go home and get you your femboy time. How’s that sound?”
“That… sounds… perfect,” he said, kissing me softly between each word.

After we got our skates untied, I saw the blimp heading to the gate. I ran across the rink, arriving at the other gate just as the blimp was landing.
“Hey, can I get the card from the drone?” I asked.
“You know we’re not supposed to give it out to anyone…”
“Yeah, but this… it’s kind of… These pictures, nobody else can see them.”

“Why? It’s not like you were shooting porn on the ice or something like that,” he said, dismissing me.
“It’s just complicated… Please?” I begged.
“Alright, fine. If someone says something, it’s on you.”
“Absolutely, I’ll take the blame. But I don’t think anyone will say anything. I’ll give you the card tomorrow. Nobody will ever know it was missing.”
“Alright then, here,” Miller said as the card popped out of the drone with a silent click sound.
“Thanks dude, you have no idea what this means to me,” I told him as he handed me the card.

I ran back to Cam, who was ready to go by this point. As we left the arena, we stopped by the pro shop – just as I promised we would – where I helped him order his own set of skates. He chose the deep sky-blue ones, of course – it was his favourite colour, after all. As soon as he held the box containing them in his hands, his face lit up with excitement. Excitement I knew all too well, and excitement I was glad to see him have about something I loved almost as much as I loved him.
